

Dating is a Game and We're All Players

Emma Schmidtke
Opinion Columnist

“Cause you know I love the players, and you love the game,” Taylor Swift cheers in her hit song, “Blank Space”. She’s satirizing the media’s perception of her, but us non-celebrities sing along with non-sarcastic gusto. Because after we’ve been broken up with for the third time, discovered the cute boy in our Am. Lit. class has a girlfriend, and swiped to the end of Tinder, dating can seem like a damp, dark pit we’re all trying to climb out of.

Thinking of the single life as a game board or a play field, keeps us from planning the names of our third or fourth cat (Abelard and Heloise, if you were curious).

Humanity has come up with a variety of ways to save dating from being a complete labor. We’ve created the pillar to civilization that is Tinder, an app listed under the “Lifestyle” section of the Apple Store when we all know it belongs in “Strategic Gaming”.

The app explicitly encourages you to “keep playing” after each match. PBS’s Game/Show describes Tinder as a textbook example of a card game. Each profile contains an ID photo followed by a list of ‘stats,’ similar to the Pokémon and Yugioh cards you might have traded as a kid. My friends and I have begun to “collect” profiles off

Dating to some extent has come to resemble a risky yet fun game where stakes can be high

Creative Commons

Tinder. Our groupchat is filled with screenshots of quirky bios, strange selfie faces, and potential soul mates for each other.

Humanity has come up with a variety of ways to save dating from being a complete labor.

The activity is not unlike buying up packs of baseball cards to see which one of us gets the MVP. Much of this past summer was spent with us all swiping in the same room, asking each other, “Have you come across the guy with four corndogs jammed in his mouth in his pic?” (My friend went on a date with Mr. Quadrado. Nice guy, actually.)

Tinder is laidback yet exciting in a way games often are and dating often isn’t, which contributes to the app’s massive popularity. With over 50 million users in 140 countries, Tinder could be considered one of the biggest online multiplayer games out there.

Even before the dawn of the dating app, the search for love and physical affection was made into a sport. We sort the aftermath of break-ups and rejections into winners and losers. We create fantasy teams out of people real and imagined we want to get together (I’ll ship Captain America and Iron Man ‘til I die. Come at me, fanboys).

We keep score, trade names and pictures like jerseys. Dating is a spectator sport bigger than the Superbowl.

But let’s clarify, games imply little or no consequences outside the match. You tackle someone in football, you win. You tackle someone in the street, you get arrested. As much as athletes like to bicker and taunt each other off court, they are in fact out of the game for most of their lives. This is where dating differs.

There’s no off court in dating. You hook up with someone Saturday night and realize Monday morning they’re in your Bio lecture and you will have to stare at the back of their neck every single Monday, Wednesday, Friday of the semester.

You cheat on your boyfriend and there’s no formal sanction to stop him from disparaging your name around campus. There’s no referees, no national organizations, no generally agreed upon rules of sportsmanship. This is real life and we’re all living with the consequences.

But that doesn’t mean dating can’t be fun. That doesn’t mean dating shouldn’t be fun.

People are spending longer on the playing field and more people are choosing to never to leave the game at all.

For much of human history, dating has been courting, a very specific means to a very specific end. Marriage, babies, love if you’re lucky. The single life was over quickly. Now, people are waiting until they’re older to get married. According to the U.S. census, average median ages of marriage for both men and women have been on the rise ever since the 1950s.

People are spending longer on the playing field and more people are choosing to never to leave the game at all. Our generation’s fear of commitment may baffle baby boomers, but as people have waited longer to get married, divorce rates have dropped.

People aren’t dying to get out of the game, rushing into marriage with the wrong people. Fewer divorces, fewer legal cases, fewer families broken apart, because we’ve found ways to enjoy the single life.

Let’s go ahead, and continue to make dating more fun. Love’s a game, so play on.

Legalized Robbery: The Injustice of Civil Asset Forfeiture

Jordan Schwakopf
Opinion Columnist

The United States of America strives for justice within its borders, yet the government shamelessly allows an injustice against its innocent citizens on a regular basis. Civil Asset Forfeiture is a law under which, even without evidence of a crime, any agency of the Justice Department can seize any and all assets from civilians.

This contrasts from Criminal Asset Forfeiture law which allows for the seizure of the property and assets from convicted criminals. Since property may be seized from innocent people Civil Asset Forfeiture is obsolete, yet the proponents of civil forfeiture laws claim this clear violation of civil rights is a necessary evil within our society.

Civil Asset Forfeiture allows for the confiscation of anything in a heartbeat: money, cars, technology, and in some cases, houses. The purpose of this law is supposedly to allow for the confiscation of illegal drugs and weapons without going to court. However the U.S. Department of Justice's 2014 statistics

Civil Asset Forfeiture is meant to be used in law enforcement to seize drugs and other illegal property. Creative Commons list cash as the most often confiscated item, with 13,983 cases in which cash was seized, double the number of cases in which drugs or illegal weapons were seized.

The main contributor to the abuse of Civil Asset Forfeiture is the profit incentive; local law enforcement agencies can keep all of the profits they make off forfeitures, and often times this money is used for bonuses or vacations, showing that the money from forfeiture is not a necessity, but is instead used for a slush fund.

The Fifth Amendment is supposed to protect people from the loss of property or assets without due process of law, otherwise known as a trial, yet civil forfeiture circumvents these protections and leaves victims defenseless.

Since the inanimate objects targeted by civil forfeiture are not protected by the Bill of Rights, any attempts to challenge the forfeiture are futile. Instead of facing an impartial judge, any appeals to the forfeiture will face a prosecutor from the district attorney's office in the courtroom.

As satirical comedian John Oliver said on his show, Last Week Tonight, in regards to civil forfeiture, "How can you even still call that a courtroom? If you take all the doctors out of a hospital and replace them with otters, that's no longer a hospital!"

In Civil Asset Forfeiture, the owner of the property or assets is not being charged with a crime. Instead, the property or assets themselves are being charged with a crime. These inanimate objects do not have the right to a jury and are considered guilty until proven innocent.

It is up to the owner to prove the property's innocence, even if no evidence exists to indicate the property is guilty. And that statement itself is preposterous: how can an inanimate object be guilty or innocent when it is incapable of making decisions and moving on its own?

If the courts are not accusing the owner of committing a crime, then it is because no crime has actually been committed. If a crime had been committed, then the owner of the property would be put on trial, and Criminal Asset Forfeiture could be used.

The Institute for Justice, a nonprofit civil liberties law firm, is currently creating a Supreme Court case with the goal of having Civil Asset Forfeiture being declared unconstitutional. While some states have begun to recognize the immorality of Civil Asset Forfeiture, state laws can be overruled by the federal law using a program called "equitable sharing".

Equitable sharing, as defined by the U.S. Department of Justice, is a program by which "the Department of Justice distributes an equitable share of forfeited property and proceeds to participating state and local law enforcement agencies that directly participate in an investigation or prosecution that result in a federal forfeiture." Or, in layman's terms, local law enforcement can ignore the state laws for the sake of making a profit. Until the federal law changes, state laws are all but meaningless to law enforcement.

I strongly urge you to not just take my word for it on this issue; go do research, read the victims' stories for yourself, and encourage others to educate themselves on this blatant disregard for our rights.

Are You Sexually Liberated?

Matthew Glaser
Opinion Editor

I hope that title grabbed your attention, and if it did grab your attention you're probably not sexually liberated. You read that correctly. If you read that title, and immediately decided this article would be worth your time you are enslaved by sex, even if you won't admit it.

I would like to contend that true sexual liberation isn't freedom from heterosexual and monogamous norms that began to collapse in the 1960s and 70s, but true sexual liberation is instead freedom from the taboo that surrounds sex in our everyday life. A taboo that makes sex something everyone is thinking about, but hardly anyone is talking about.

To start off, I'm not saying that the collapse of traditional sexual norms that has taken place in much of the western world the past 60 years is awful. I'm also not saying sexual liberation is the abolishment of sex from all thought and interaction. That would be ludicrous. We are sexual beings after all. We are as much animals as any cat or cow. What I propose is that the domination of sex is a large component of the current zeitgeist that needs addressing.

This can be hard to see as a member from within society, but consider a few of the statistics. In 2014, Pornhub racked up a total 78.9 Billion views worldwide. Taking into consideration that almost 3 Billion people had access to the internet in 2014, according to Internet Live Stats, that's still quite an impressive viewership. What's even more telling is that almost half of Pornhub's traffic came in through cellular devices.

The reason this is telling is because it points to the fact that people aren't just sitting down on their personal computers in the privacy of their home to watch porn. They are likely watching it on the go as well. Besides the consumption of porn, one only need look at popular media in large to see sexual themes and allusions looming around every corner.

So what? Perhaps the pervasiveness of sexualized media in society is just a sign that we're finally overcoming sex as a taboo topic. To a certain extent this may be the case. Education around sex, safe sex, and consensual sex, is increasing much for the better of society.

Yet, outside of these educational events and some groups, sex is hardly ever talked about and many people are uncomfortable talking about sex. Understandably, it can be super awkward to talk about your personal sex life, but that's not what I'm talking about.

What I'm talking about is how very few people bring up topics that center around sex and how it affects our everyday lives. When is the last conversation you had with someone about how women and men are depicted in advertising and other forms of media? When's the last time you talked about the sexual nature of language in online video game culture and other sub-sets of society?

When's the last time you had a talk with someone about the possessive nature of the phrase 'have sex', when sex is an activity, a verb, but we talk about it as a noun or object? (That last one might just be a curiosity of mine admittedly).

I don't want you to not think about sex at all. What I want is for you to recognize the influence of sex in media and our culture on your thoughts and interactions with others. Perhaps, if we can start to address some of the questions

I've asked, and have conversations about the role of sex in our thoughts and society we can begin to liberate ourselves from the oppressive taboo that surrounds sex. We can become truly sexually liberated beings, and talk about more interesting things like the Trans-Pacific Partnership.

The Necessity of the Collective

Sean Kehren
Opinion Columnist

Thinking of the group ahead of one's self and working together in community may be essential to human flourishing.

Creative Commons

Since the Ronald Regan era, it seems like emphasis has been placed on the individual over the collective. A collective can be one's local organizations or even the United States as a whole; the individual can be the self or, since Citizens United, a corporation. Every day many people function chaotically, running around aimlessly completing tasks that might benefit others but most likely only themselves.

The society that we have created and have been molded by puts immense pressure on the individual to perform near perfectly in every aspect of life. Thinkers like Emile Durkheim have analyzed suicide rates as a function of characteristics of capitalist societies and have found that the responsibilities put upon people by our socio-economic structure creates a great amount of despair within society.

Cases of suicide and rates of depression have been found to increase with societies who expect greater amounts of responsibility or give greater amounts of social freedom to their citizens.

Now, I'm not saying that we need to curb freedom in the United States, but some aspects of society are affecting the mindset of our citizens negatively and threaten the cohesiveness of the collective.

Although I'm an atheist, I will freely admit that religion seems to give a positive structure to the lives of many people. Those who have little money or who are trying to stay sober find a comfort in a power above their own comprehension. Without attempting to sound like a Kierkegaard fanboy, I also believe comfort or faith helps to fend off despair and possibly lower suicide. Honestly, I believe that religion might be a necessity to keep a society cohesive because many people need faith in order to cope with the realities of life.

Religion, however, is not the only organization that can help bind people together. Labor unions, book clubs, and neighborhood watch groups are all ways that people can build relationships with their fellow citizens. It's not that we need to live in a manifestation of a '50s sitcom, but our society seems to be splitting upon lines that are a little hard to chalk up to coincidence.

One of the biggest dangers to American society is widening income inequality that debilitates the poor and shifts economic power to the wealthiest Americans. Conservatives tout that Americans all have equal opportunity to take control of their lives and live in economic stability.

How funny it seems that those politicians who put forth these policies are the same people that own large companies inherited from their family or who got into an Ivy League school because of their "legacy grant". Yes, of course there are women and men who accomplished great feats in their life and have Horatio Alger "rags to riches" stories that could be considered tear-wrenching, but what is forgotten by many people is the simple fact that some people are born with more opportunities than others.

One of the biggest dangers to American society is widening income inequality that debilitates the poor and shifts economic power to the wealthiest Americans.

A possible reply might be worded: "Indeed, some people are born more fortunate than others, but humans should strive through humble beginnings by focusing on themselves. Economic freedom is more basic to human life than giving handouts to the poor."

Alright, maybe I made that a little too harsh, but to me, this is exactly what their argument boils down to.

The brand of capitalism that many hardcore conservatives brandish these days could be considered "Economic Darwinism." Coincidentally, many of these same people do not believe in Darwin's theory of evolution by natural selection, which is a great system that traces all of us to a common ancestor.

I guess what this rant is es-

The collective allows us to socially bond with one another and provide essential information for one another in order to "live the good life."

entially getting to is that we, as humans, seem to have some sort of empathy for one another. There are exceptions for this general principle, but empathy is a word that we give to the bond that humans feel for one another. It's something that can also be seen as practical for humanity because it increases fitness for the entire species.

Maybe if our priorities were sighted toward ourselves, our families, and the collective together instead of focusing mostly on the first of these three, we would feel more fulfilled as humans and minimize mental illness.

The collective allows us to socially bond with one another and provide essential information for one another in order to "live the good life." We need to focus on how we can make our society more cohesive. Remember, Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka was only 61 years ago. Humans have the potential to be better toward one another and, in turn, change society for the better as well. This is not idealism; it's realistic optimism.

BENEATH THE CROWN

What is a personal goal that you set and achieved?

"I think I would say just becoming self-confident because I was such an introvert as a child. So just becoming me and gaining self-confidence and being aware of who I am and figuring that out across time. I just started out as an embarrassed little kid and really awkward, as most people do. But as I've gone through my journey in life, I've found out more about who I am and that was a really big goal for me: figuring out what my purpose is in life and who I want to be as well as who I want to present myself as, so that was my main goal. Just figuring out myself!"

Julia Wenstrom

Cameron MacDonald

Is there a personal goal that you set for college that you have achieved or are currently working towards?

"Well, figuring out my track for my education, because when I came in to college I had no idea what I wanted to do. I basically goofed around my first year trying to figure it out, and then one day it just hit me and so I figured that out, which was my main goal when I came to college so now I'm going along with that. I've had a few great opportunities this year and I'm still kind of figuring things out. When people ask 'What are you going to do after you graduate?' I'm still not sure how to answer that. So I'm just taking things as they come. I'd say I've achieved most things that I wanted to when I came to school. I want to say getting my voice out there was a big one, being heard. That goes back to me being an introvert and growing out of that and having people know who I am now."

What kind of advice would you give to someone who has set a personal goal?

"My main thing is to write it down and hang it somewhere where you'll see it every day. I have a little corkboard above my desk and that's where I get ready for the day. I always hang little things there, like life quotes or Bible verses, and that's something you'll see every day. And when you see it, you'll remind yourself 'This is what I'm striving for, this is what I want to accomplish.' That's my main way to focus on it." - Julia Wenstrom

Men's Soccer struggles to find rhythm

Gustavus Sports Information

The Gustavus Men's Soccer team have spiked their fans expectations by reaching the NCAA National Tournament three years in a row. This year, the team is off to a rough start. After suffering two losses against MIAC powerhouses St. Olaf College and the University of St. Thomas, the team failed to capitalize on none of their 13 attempts on goal at Saint Mary's University in Winona. The game finished 0-0 after double over-time. This weekend, the team travels to Northfield to battle against the Carleton Knights, another MIAC Championship contender.

Senior Spotlight

Becca Woodstra

The outside hitter from Minnetonka remains a solid piece in the team that is on a thirteen game win streak.

Q: What are your expectations for the season?

A: I had high expectations for my senior season. I knew we had some great talent coming in and that each and every person on the team was re-committed and ready to work hard. An effort was made to move from a "good" team to a "great" team. Goals are set to win the conference and make it to the National Tournament.

Q: What is your best athletic memory?

A: My favorite volleyball memory is hands down the Nicaragua trip last summer. A large portion of the trip was spent volunteering- putting on free clinics for local youth, teaching english at schools, helping the "mobile library" give books to children in rural areas, etc. We played the National team three times, once outside on a concrete court on the ocean! The rest of the time was spent touring, hiking, surfing, swimming, shopping and enjoying the beautiful country. It was a fabulous trip with a great group of girls.

Q: Why would you recommend Gustavus?

A: Gustavus is a very special place with beautiful grounds, warm and engaging profs, awesome athletics, and a very talented and intelligent student body. I'm so thankful I chose Gustavus and can't imagine graduating in the spring and having to move on, this school has become my home.

Women's Rugby keeps on growing

Caroline Probst

Although the Women's Rugby team lost many prominent seniors last year, the team remains strong as they have been successful recruiting throughout the fall. The "Ruggers" next home game is on Saturday, October 17 against Macalester College.

Emily Knutson
Copy Editor

The Gustavus Women's Rugby team plays a challenging game many are unfamiliar with. With rules such as the ball can only be passed backwards, it is no surprise the game can be described as organized chaos.

"It is the most bizarre sport I have ever seen, but in the best of ways," Junior Biology major Megan Quirk said. She just joined the team this fall and recently played in her first game.

"All of a sudden one of my teammates came running from the field and said, 'Megan, you're in!' I had absolutely no idea what I was doing but I loved every minute of it," Quirk said.

Quirk, along with all the other new members of the team, will learn the rules and strategies of the game but more importantly the tradition behind it as well. Coach Charlie Johnson, who has been with the team since the spring of 2009, loves sharing the history of the sport.

"People have a preconceived notion about what the sport is. I think it's much safer than American football. That's without pads or helmets," Johnson said.

American football can trace its roots back to early versions of rugby football. It all started in 1823 when William Webb Ellis picked up a soccer ball and ran with it at his school, Rugby. Many terms used in American football today come from rugby.

—Coach Charlie Johnson

"You physically have to touch the ball to the ground in rugby to score, that's where the term 'touch down' comes from," Johnson said.

A "try" is the rugby equivalent of a touchdown. The extra point attempt in American football (PAT) derives from rugby: the point-after-try.

Like other sports, rugby requires players to push themselves in order to compete at a high level. The sport is unique because the Women's Rugby team plays exactly the same as their male counterparts do.

"There is no difference between men and women's rugby. By that I mean in hockey there's no checking for women, tennis there are less sets, in basketball the ball is lighter, in volleyball the net isn't as high, softball you have to pitch underhand, and in golf they have to tee off closer. When the men's rugby team plays we take the same ball and play the same game," Johnson said.

The team is very inclusive and anyone who is interested in joining is welcome to give it a shot. Junior Scandinavian Studies major Hannah Birkholz is in her fourth season and is one of two captains for the year.

"We have people who are all different shapes and sizes. Our team tends to be on the smaller side compared to other teams that we play. We make up for that in speed," Birkholz said.

Speed is important in the game but strength is equally valued. The team is open to any females at Gustavus who want to try, regardless of their stature and current physical capabilities.

"Some people are self-conscious when they join and rugby helps them develop a better self image," Birkholz said. "Anyone can play. You don't need to have any prior experience, almost no one on the team has played before they joined."

Fall season is the competitive season for Women's Rugby. Spring season is a non-competitive learning season to teach new players the game and work on skills. The Women's Rugby Team plays on Saturdays. Home games typically start between 11 and 1 and take place on the Rugby Pitch. Most fans stand as they watch the game.

Come out and support the team at their next home game on Saturday, October 17 as they take on Macalester College.

Football hot streak continues, defeats Augsburg in Homecoming encounter

Gustavus Sports Information

The Football team improved to a perfect 4-0 record as they fought off the Augsburg Aggies in a 59-42 win during Homecoming weekend. The Gusties will face an even bigger test this weekend as they travel to Northfield to square up with the Carleton Knights.

Jacob Woodrich
Staff Writer

This past Saturday was a big day at Gustavus. Current students, Gustie alumni, friends and family, among many others crowded the campus for Homecoming festivities. Perhaps one of the busiest events on campus was the annual Homecoming Football game where Gustavus hosted the Auggies of Augsburg College.

The Gusties took the lead quickly in the first quarter and never looked back, winning the game 59-42. The Gustavus offense was running on all cylinders all game long.

"It was really a team effort. Offensively, we protected and blocked well and our skill players made big plays," Head Coach Peter Haugen said.

The high scoring affair was backed by a strong performance from Senior Quarterback Mitch Hendricks, who tossed four touchdowns through the air, and ran a touchdown in, as well. Three of Hendricks' touchdowns were hauled in by Senior Wide Receiver Matthew Boyce.

"We did exactly what we wanted to. We scored on all but one drive and we made big plays when we had to and came out with a big win against a great opponent," Boyce said. Boyce finished the game with eight receptions and 106 receiving yards.

"We had a little bit of pressure coming into the week, but nothing that we can't handle. We knew that we were going to have a great crowd. That tiny bit of pressure that we felt I think made us practice better and play better."

—Matt Boyce

"It felt great to help lead my team. Mitch Hendricks and the entire offensive line were also a huge reason that we were able to win Saturday. They all came ready to play and the scoreboard says the rest," Boyce said.

On the defensive side of the ball, the Gusties had their hands full with dual threat quarterback, Ayrton Scott, who was dangerous both through the air and on the ground.

"He is very difficult to defend because he passes and runs so well. Our goal was to try and force him to hurry his throws and work to contain him when he runs," Coach Haugen said.

The defense did a great job with that goal. The Gusties forced three fumbles, as well as returned an interception for a touchdown.

"Defensively we created some key turnovers and were able to score with the big interception from Nick Frandsen," Coach Haugen said.

Even though there may have been a few less empty seats compared to other weeks, the preparation for the game was still business as usual.

"We prepared this week the same as we always do," Coach Haugen said.

There may have been a bit of added pressure with the big crowd, but the team used that to their advantage.

"We had a little bit of pressure coming into the week, but nothing that we can't handle. We knew that we were going to have a great crowd. That tiny bit of pressure that we felt I think made us practice and play better," Boyce said.

As for the rest of the season, the team's goals and expectations stay the same.

"My expectations for the rest of the season is to continue to improve daily and keep focusing week by week to get the win," Junior Linebacker Tyler Jakes said.

The Gusties take the field next on Saturday, October 3rd at 1 PM in Northfield as they take on Carleton College. The team's focus is now on Carleton and Carleton only.

"Our team goal the rest of the season is to go 1-0 every week. We aren't worried about anybody but Carleton. We know that if we play our game every week and do everything that we can, we should be in contention for a MIAC championship," Boyce said.

The next home game will be on October 10th at 1 PM, when the Gusties host St. Olaf College during Family Weekend.
